Early Years in Rosario

Birth and Family Background

Lionel Andrés Messi was born on June 24, 1987, in the modest suburb of Rosario, Argentina. He is the third child of Jorge Messi, a factory steelworker, and Celia Sola, a schoolteacher. Messi's parents named him after their favorite football club, Newell's Old Boys, hoping their son would one day play for the team.

Diagnosis of Growth Hormone Deficiency

From an early age, Messi displayed an intense passion for football. However, he faced a significant challenge: a severe growth hormone deficiency that left him only 1.54 meters tall as a teenager. The condition threatened to derail his ambitions, but with the support of his family, he began treatment that would cost the family a considerable amount of money each month.

Early Football Development

Messi's talent was evident from the start. He joined the local club Newell's Old Boys at the age of six. Under the guidance of coach Jorge Sampaoli, he developed a keen sense of positioning and an innate ability to read the game. By 10, he was already a standout performer, attracting attention from clubs across Argentina.

In 2000, Barcelona's technical director, Joan Laporta, spotted Messi during a youth tournament. Recognizing his potential, the club offered to cover his medical treatment. The deal was finalized in 2003, and Messi, then 16, relocated to Spain, leaving his family behind in Rosario.
